AER

The Public Map Viewer:

Is available to everyone who can access the internet, and provides energy related maps of the province. There are many different data layers that you can turn on and off, including the status of reclamation certificate applications. This tool can be found on our Talk AER website at talk.aer.ca/onestop.

Flowback Emissions Study:

In 2015, the AER completed the recurrent human health complaint process in the Lochend and Didsbury areas. These reports are available on the AER website at:

http://www.aer.ca/documents/reports/LochendSynthesis_July2015.pdf and http://www.aer.ca/documents/reports/DidsburyTechnicalSynthesis_August2015.pdf.

These assessments concluded that flaring related to oil and gas production in these areas has not exceeded Alberta's ambient air quality objectives. The AER also concluded a monitoring gap exists for air emissions generated during flaring in the initial stages of new well development. As a result of this review and the gap identified, the AER has been working with Alberta Health on developing a study to look at increasing the understanding of air emissions resulting from flowback of hydraulically fractured wells during the initial stages of new development, specifically during fracturing flowback. First sampling could occur by end of September to the beginning of October in the Drayton Valley and Rocky Mountain House areas.
